

06 | How I Operate: Routines & Energy Management

Not a reader? Listen to the “Deep Dive” by NoteBookLM

attachment:93d3829a-83b0-42da-ad38-40d68f8552a6:Codys_Guide_to_Understanding_and_Connection_-_06_How_I_Operate_Routines_Energy_Management.wav

- Mornings are rough — I have Delayed Sleep Phase Syndrome and Sleep Inertia.
- Please don't assume my day starts before noon unless prearranged.
- My energy comes in bursts. I might do 3 days of work in 1 or disappear to recover.

6.1 Feedback

- I love constructive feedback.
- Please be kind and clear. I'm likely already aware of any perceived “failure.”
- Phrase things like: “Would you be open to...?” or “Can I share something I noticed?”

Here's how Cody's routines and energy management style reflects their intersecting identities:

Sleep and Morning Routines:

- Due to Delayed Sleep Phase Syndrome and Sleep Inertia, Cody requires a later start to their day - specifically after noon unless pre-arranged. This biological sleep pattern needs to be respected and accommodated, especially given their neurodivergent needs.

Energy Management:

- They experience intense energy fluctuations, working intensively during high-energy periods followed by recovery time. This burst pattern is common in people with ADHD and requires understanding from colleagues and collaborators.

Feedback and Communication:

- While they welcome constructive feedback, they need it delivered with kindness and clarity. This sensitivity likely stems from experiences as both a transgender person and someone with PTSD who needs to feel safe from criticism.

Preferred Communication Style:

- They appreciate gentle, permission-based approaches to feedback, such as "Would you be open to...?" or "Can I share something I noticed?" This approach helps maintain psychological safety while allowing for growth and improvement.